

Frontier Wars retreat at the War Memorial

This document follows the history of the Australian War Memorial's approach to the Australian Frontier Wars. It covers the period September 2022 to June 2023. The material was collected on the Honest History website (honesthistory.net.au). Most of it originally appeared in the mainstream media or was our analysis of Senate Estimates hearings.

Our first post on 29 September noted the encouraging remarks of then Memorial Council Chair, Brendan Nelson (the Council had decided the Memorial would provide a much broader, much deeper depiction of the Frontier Wars) and the follow-up from others, including scepticism from Council member and RSL national president, Major General Greg Melick. We suggested all should wait and see what came next. Our analysis of later media reports encouraged us to remain cautious. More of the same.

The Memorial missed an opportunity at Senate Estimates in November to provide some clarity. Meanwhile, Chair Nelson was packing his bags for London and a new job with Boeing, and new Chair, Kim Beazley, was preparing to take up the baton.

Henry Reynolds and Rachel Perkins, long-time advocates of change at the Memorial, tried to sound hopeful. Honest History, however, was more sceptical on the basis of close analysis of what the Memorial had said at Estimates and since. Early in December, we started to say the Memorial was 'running away' from the Frontier Wars, even as Mr Beazley made his first tentative remarks as Chair. More analysis of November Estimates.

We tracked Mr Beazley's successive media appearances, as he gradually refined his position and moved to support for the Memorial giving 'substantial' coverage to the Frontier Wars and giving Indigenous people 'the dignity of resistance'. More of the same. We pointed out that the Chair now had the task of bringing others along with him – apart from people like us, who supported him.

The Chair kept talking. And again.

The question remained, though, what did 'substantial' mean, particularly as there was ample evidence that Memorial management was not singing from the same sheet as the Chair? Indeed, Memorial management admitted that it expected to devote very little more space to the Frontier Wars after the redevelopment than it had before, and that space would, as before, be shared with four late 19th century military expeditions in support of Queen Victoria.

February Senate Estimates provided no further clues. Chair Beazley kept talking.

Early in May, in an answer to a Senator's question, Memorial management doubled down on the minimal change scenario. Four weeks later, at May Senate Estimates, Memorial management stuck to its guns, amid accusations that its Frontier Wars evidence to previous Estimates had been misleading – or at least showed a lack of awareness of history and of the briefings it had received from its own historians. This Estimates hearing was uncomfortable, even by the high standards of that venue.

A hint of the reasons for this embarrassing situation emerged in a media report of a difference of view between Chair Beazley and the Council's September decision, on the one hand, and Major General Melick of the Council and the RSL, on the other. We had already

written about the 'credibility gap' at the Memorial on the Frontier Wars; it seemed to be personified as Beazley vs Melick. More on this aspect.

The Major General argued the Memorial should stick to portraying uniformed soldiers, presumably like those who went to New Zealand, the Sudan, China, and South Africa from 1860 to 1900, to defend the Empire of the dear Queen, Victoria, that is. (God Bless Her!) The Chair presumably maintained the line he had been pursuing for the first months of the year (giving non-uniformed Indigenous warriors 'the dignity of resistance'), although by June he was less inclined to say so publicly.

Honest History and the members of the new Defending Country Memorial Project Inc. thought Beazley should ask Melick to resign. We told Beazley – and the Minister – just this.

9 July 2023